I am just curious if larger companies or better managed companies is paying more to its employees. I'm sure the benefit programs play a large role. A: Not really. The number of people in the company is just a scale factor that you use to relate things to each other, but it's not making any substantial difference. What makes companies hire more employees is that they want to expand. As a general rule, you spend a lot more money in a company when it's growing. In order to spend more money, you'll need a lot more employees. However, the company is paying that cost, so the salary cost of having more employees is just being spread over more employees, and this is why the number doesn't matter. A: In other words, yes. Salaries and benefits may scale up with company size, but as a salary for an employee, it only depends on company size if the company is doing a lot of outsourcing or giving a lot of perks and benefits. However, usually when a company is large, it means they have a lot of overhead, which means lower profit margins, so it doesn't scale up as fast. In general, the only way to know the exact cost of individual employees is to do a detailed cost analysis with individual time records that is broken down by function, etc. In theory, a company could even do this by having individual employees cost the same as one another. In practice, it's usually cheaper to pay one person more than it is to have two people pay the same amount, since one person's total salary only has to be paid once. Or more likely, since the company is paying the benefits anyway, the actual salaries for one person are all the same. A: Employee wage cost is typically (relatively) uniform across a company, regardless of size, regardless of number of people. From a raw pay perspective, it's a very good job. What that cost actually ends up paying for is complicated, however. Not only does it pay for things like office space, (which may be real or just headcount), but also the salaries of executives and senior management. The factors which influence this are not trivial, and often depend f678ea9f9e
